The Story of Lohengrin.

ACT I.—Henry "the Fowler", King of Germany, has come to Antwerp to summon his lieges against the Hungarians, who threaten the eastern frontier; he finds the chiefs divided and without a leader—Gottfried, the young son of the late Duke, having mysteriously disappeared, and Frederick Telramund, in virtue of his wife's royal descent, claiming the sovereignty of Brabant. Telramund openly accuses Elsa (Gottfried's sister) of having murdered her brother to win the crown for herself; Elsa is summoned to appear and answer the charge; the King decrees that her cause shall be submitted to ordeal of battle between Telramund and any champion Elsa may choose to defend her. She describes a Knight whom she has seen in a vision, and conjures him to fight for her. After repeated appeals, a skiff, drawn by a swan, is seen to approach the shore; in it is Lohengrin, Elsa's chosen Knight, who accepts Telramund's challenge. Before they fight, Lohengrin betroths himself to Elsa, first claiming her solemn promise never to question him as to his name or race, nor whence he came to her; Telramund is overcome in the combat, and stripped of lands and honors.

ACT II.—Telramund and Ortrud (his wife) are watching outside the Palace, which resounds with mirth and revelry; they are determined yet to accomplish the ruin of Elsa and Lohengrin, and be reinstated in their former rank. Elsa appears on the balcony, and to her Ortrud makes a piteous appeal, which so effectually moves Elsa to compassion, that she promises to obtain the reprieve of Telramund's sentence. She offers to shelter Ortrud for the night, who, amid false protestations of gratitude, affects concern for the uncertainty of Elsa's future happiness, and contrives to insinuate the first germs of suspicion in Elsa's mind. They enter the abode of Elsa. The retainers and vassals assemble to form the bridal procession. Ortrud appears in the train of Elsa's ladies; arrived at the steps of the Minster, she cannot restrain her haughty temper, and disputes Elsa's right of precedence; in the midst of the ensuing commotion the King and Lohengrin enter. Lohengrin reproves his bride for holding converse with the evil-minded woman; they are proceeding to the church when Telramund interposes and accuses Lohengrin of sorcery, alleging the strange manner of his coming amongst them, and the mystery in which his name and rank are shrouded, in support of the declaration. The faith of the King and his Knights in Lohengrin, however, remains unshaken; doubts for a moment overwhelm Elsa, but she casts them aside; the train finally enters the church, and they are united.

Act III.—Elsa and Lohengrin are conducted to the bridal chamber by a train of Knights and Ladies, and for the first time are alone; doubt and suspicion by this time having taken complete possession of Elsa's mind, she questions her husband with growing vehemence, unmindful of his warnings that her doubts must end their happiness, for, if she insist, to her he must reveal his secret. When their altercation is at its height a murderous attempt is made on Lohengrin's life by Telramund and four of his followers. Elsa, quick to perceive their intent, hands Lohengrin his sword, who strikes Telramund dead with a single blow. He then places Elsa in the care of her Ladies, charging them to lead her into the presence of the King. Before the King he meets her once more and reveals himself to be the son of Percival, and a Knight of the Holy Grail; being known, he is now bound to return to its mysterious guardianship. As he speaks, the swan, drawing the skiff, appears again on the river, and to Elsa's unspeakable grief, he bids her an eternal farewell. Before he steps into the skiff he disenchants the swan, who is no other than Gottfried, transformed by Ortrud's sorcery, and who now takes rightful possession of his Dukedom.

Lohengrin.

(Copyright, 1897, by G. Schirmer.)

When Richard Wagner was collecting the materials out of which he built the wonderfully tragic and powerful "Tannhäuser", he naturally read the famous old medieval poem "Der Wartburgkrieg". This poem, narrating the story of a notable contest of song at the Wartburg Castle, dealt with Wolfram von Eschenbach as if he were a legendary personage. Wagner, knowing that he was a reality, procured his great epic, "Parzival", and reading it with enthusiasm, drew from it much of the material used in the construction of his music-drama "Parsifal" and his more lyric work "Lohengrin". It was while passing the summer of 1845 at Marienbad that Wagner laid out the plan of the most popular lyric opera of our time. He wrote the book in the course of the following winter, and the music the next year.

It must not be supposed that he accepted the insufficient outline of the story as found in Wolfram's poem. Wagner's method of literary composition was to gather all the versions of a national mythological legend, and select the incidents and characters which fitted into his plan, which was always determined by dramatic propriety and ethical purpose. Franz Muncker, in his excellent and compact sketch of Wagner's life and works, tells us that in Paris the poet-composer had become acquainted with the medieval poem of a Bavarian author recounting the history of Lohengrin, son of Parsifal, Keeper of the Holy Grail, and of his journey to Elsa of Brabant. He also read the legend in its old popular form as related in the "Deutsche Sagen" of the Grimm Brothers, and he made use of parts of Conrad von Würzburg's "Schwanritter", of the "Younger Titurel", and of the old Teutonic belief that through magic human beings can be transformed into swans.

In the winter of 1845 the master arranged the situations and invented the principal themes of his work. He began the composition of the music with the narrative of Lohengrin in the last scene of the third act, because, like Senta's ballad in "The Flying Dutchman", that passage contained the musical germs of the whole work. The third act, then, was composed between September 9, 1846, and March 5, 1847, while he was at Grossgraufen, near Pillnitz. The first act was composed between May 12 and June 8, 1847. The second act was written between June 18 and August 2, 1847, and the prelude was completed on August 28 of the same year. The instrumentation occupied the composer during the following winter and spring. The score of the opera remained unpublished for some years, because Meser, who had brought out Wagner's previous works, had lost much money by them, and declined to touch "Lohengrin". The rights of publication where subsequently acquired at a small price by Breitkopf & Härtel.

Managers were equally unwilling to risk the fortunes of a public production of a new work by a much-criticized and generally misunderstood master. Wagner tells us how he took out the score one day, and gazing at it, was filled with sorrow that the notes might never "sound from off the death-pale paper". In despair he wrote to Liszt, his good friend and the musical god of Weimar, begging him to perform the work, and back came the answer that it was already in preparation. Wagner himself did not hear "Lohengrin" till 1859, but it was produced at Weimar, Liszt conducting, on August 28, 1850. The original cast consisted of Fräulein Agthe as Elsa, Fräulein Faisstlinger as Ortrud, Herr Beck as Lohengrin, Milde as Telramund, Höfer as King Henry, "Lohengrin" was first given at Wiesbaden in 1853, Leipsic, Schwerin, Frankfort, Darmstadt, Breslau, and Stettin in 1854; Cologne, Hamburg, Riga, and Prague, 1855; Munich and Vienna, 1858; Berlin and Dresden, 1859; New York in Italian, 1874, in German, 1884; in London, 1875; and in Paris, 1887. It is to-day performed on the continent of Europe more frequently than any other opera.

The action of "Lohengrin" takes place in the tenth century. At the rise of the curtain King Henry is seen seated on his throne in a meadow. He has come to urge the nobles of Brabant to defense against a Hungarian invasion, and also to investigate domestic troubles. Count Telramund accuses Elsa, daughter of the late Duke of Brabant, and Telramund's ward, of murdering her brother. He demands that he, as next heir to the Duke, be made ruler of Brabant and that Elsa be punished. Elsa is summoned, and instead of defending herself, tells of her vision of a knight who is to be her defender and her lord. The dispute between her and Telramund is, according to the custom, submitted to the ordeal of combat. Elsa declares that the knight of her vision will be her champion. After she has prayed, he appears, coming down the river in a boat drawn by a swan. He asks Elsa to be his wife, but exacts from her a promise never to ask who he is or whence he came. She promises. The combat follows. Lohengrin triumphs, but spares Telramund's life.

The second act reveals Telramund and his wife Ortrud sitting in disgrace and sorrow on the steps of the palace at Antwerp. A scene of bitter recrimination between them, fully explained by its text, follows. Ortrud, however, tells Telramund that she will instil doubt into Elsa's mind and lead her to ask Lohengrin the fatal question, when he will at once leave her and return to his home. Elsa appears on her balcony and Ortrud appeals to her. The maiden descends, and Ortrud at once begins her evil labor. The two go into the palace together. Morning dawns, and the Herald of the King proclaims Telramund an outlaw and Lohengrin ruler of Brabant. The bridal procession appears and is about to enter the church when Ortrud interposes, claims precedence over Elsa, and declares that Lohengrin is a sorcerer. The King and Lohengrin appear and end this scene. The procession again advances, to be interrupted again, this time by Telramund, who repeats his wife's accusations. After a further attempt by Telramund to shake the faith of Elsa, the procession enters the cathedral.

The third act begins with the arrival of the bridal couple in their apartments, accompanied by the King and the nobles. The lovers are left alone, and now Elsa's curiosity gets the better of her devotion. Finally, she asks the question, and at that instant Telramund and four companions enter with drawn swords. Elsa hurriedly gives Lohengrin his own sword and he slays Telramund. Elsa now realizes the significance of her error, but Lohengrin summons her women and bids them take her to the King, before whom he will reveal his name and station.

The second scene of this act takes place in the meadow by the river. Telramund's body is borne on, and Elsa and Lohengrin also arrive. Lohengrin announces that he cannot be the leader of the warriors. He now tells his story. He is Lohengrin, the son of Parsifal, Keeper of the Holy Grail, and as one of the Grail Knights he is endowed with power to defend the innocent, but only so long as he preserves the secret of his name and rank. Now that these are told, he must break his own heart as well as Elsa's by a final departure. The swan returns with the boat. Ortrud, in this moment of triumph, cannot refrain from declaring that the swan is no other than Elsa's missing brother changed into a bird by her enchantments. Lohengrin prays, the swan is retransformed into Elsa's brother, and a dove draws away the boat containing the Knight of the Grail.

It would not be at all difficult to write a long essay on the music of "Lohengrin", but this is not the place for it. The work belongs to what is known as Wagner's transition-period. It stands between the two earlier works, in which old operatic forms and traditions are to a considerable extent preserved, and the later creations of the master, in which his own theories are fully developed. In "Lohengrin" we first meet with Wagner's "continuous melody". There are no separate numbers as there were in the old operas, and as there are even in "Tannhäuser", but the music flows spontaneously in faithful accompaniment to the suggestions of the text from the beginning of each act to the end.

A natural result of this plan is the firm and convincing coherency of the music. The style is absolutely unique, and its individuality is preserved from beginning to end. Only in the beginning of the second act is there a complete departure from the essentially sweet and fluent character of the melody ; but the duet between Ortrud and Telramund is, perhaps, the most satisfactory exposition of Wagner's genius in the whole work. Certainly nowhere else in "Lohengrin" do poetry, scenic painting, music, and action unite so perfectly in the production of that dramatic totality which Wagner called the art-work of the future. I recommend to those who sincerely desire to understand Wagner's theory of operatic art a careful study of this scene, not alone in the score, but in the theatre, where only it is to be observed in its entirety.

Leading-motives are used in this opera, but only incidentally, as they were in "Tannhäuser". The system had not reached its perfection in the master's mind, and the "typical phrase" had not yet become the entire material of his music. Nevertheless, the most important personages, objects, and emotions have their musical embodiments in the score of "Lohengrin". If anything were to be gained by making a catalogue of them, I should insert one here ; but there is altogether too much cataloguing of leading-motives. There is nothing in the music of any Wagner drama which is not fully explained by the text, and it is only necessary to bear in mind the fact that Wagner aimed at an organic union between poetry and music, and not a mere production of ear-tickling sounds. Furthermore, general consent seems to have excepted "Lohengrin" from the necessity of explanation. No one writes handbooks to it, and no one lectures about it. This is not because it is a more satisfactory work of art than any other work of Wagner, but because, while its musical form is radically different from that of the distinctively Italian opera, its musical style is immediately appreciable by the least-educated ear. An examination of the score will show that it teems with beautiful and original ideas, and that it is a remarkable embodiment of musical skill and learning. But the results are : apparent spontaneity, a wealth of melodic beauty, and a gorgeousness of vocal and instrumental color, which inspire the imagination and move the heart.

"Lohengrin" has for years been the most popular opera in America when presented with a satisfactory company of singers. It has had some admirable casts. One of the best that ever sang it in Italian was that of the season of 1883–1884 at the Metropolitan Opera House, when Christine Nilsson was the Elsa, Emma Fursch-Madi the Ortrud, Italo Campanini the Lohengrin, Guiseppe Kaschmann the Telramund, and Francesco Novara the King. But undoubtedly the best cast ever assembled in this country, and one of the best in the history of the work, was that which performed "Lohengrin" in German at the Metropolitan in the season of 1895–1896. Mme. Lillian Nordica was the Elsa, Mme. Marie Brema the Ortrud, M. Jean de Reszké the Lohengrin, M. Kaschmann the Telramund, and M. Edouard de Reszké the King.

Scene III.

(Here the skiff, drawn by the swan, reaches the shore in the centre at the back of the stage; Lohengrin, in a silver coat of mail, with a shining helmet, his shield at his back, a little golden horn at his side, stands within it, leaning on his sword. Frederick gazes on Lohengrin in speechless amazement. Ortrud, who during the preceding had preserved a cold and haughty bearing, is seized by terrible consternation at the sight of the swan. All deferentially bare their heads.)

1 Piccolo, 2 Flutes, 3 Oboes, 3 Cls. in A, 3 Bassoons, Horns in E and A, 3 Trumpets in E, 3 Trombones, Bass Tuba, Kettle-Drum in A and E, Cymbals and Strings.

(On the stage behind the scenes.) 2 Flutes & Piccolo, 3 Oboes, 3 Clarinets in C, 2 Bassoons, 3 Horns in D, 3 Trombones, Kettle Drum in D, Cymbals.

(In the Orchestra.) 3 Flutes, 2 Oboes, Corno inglese, 2 Clar's in A, Bass Clar. in A, 3 Bss'ns, Horns in E & D, 3 Trumpets, 3 Trombones, Bass Tuba, Kettle Drums in F♯ & C♯, & Strings.

(The curtain rises. Scene, the citadel of Antwerp; at the back the Palas (dwelling of Knights); in the foreground the Kemenate (dwelling of women); r.h. the Minster. It is night. Ortrud and Frederick, both in dark, servile garments, are seated on the steps of the Minster; Frederick is musing gloomily, Ortrud gazing fixedly at the windows of the Palas, which is brightly illuminated.)

(Lohengrin, standing on the bank, has heard all that Ortrud said, he now sinks on his knees in mute prayer. All eyes turn with anxious expectancy to him. The white dove of the Grail flies slowly down and hovers over the skiff, Lohengrin perceives it, and with a grateful look rises quickly, and loosens the chain from the swan, who immediately sinks. In its place Lohengrin raises Gottfried, a fair
